HARD NEWS

Rama, Tara - R, T •

R: talks of the fiascos going on between the ruling families who don't rule anything!
Enlightening to be here as one age ends and another is beginning – and we are in it!

- Talked to Sweet Angelique in Paris today: have another curfew from 6 am – 9 am;
 - as a Paschat, she can go out as she needs to: knows how to walk through walls!
 - Talked of the fiasco between Macron and Erdogan, & Macron cracking down on people who are part of Islam; he's trying to target people in France who have Muslim background, people of Islamic background, in France, and blow it out of proportion – due to the incidents going on.
 - Like the teacher who lost his head – someone helped him – a Chechnian kid did the beheading and the parents and some of the kids in the class helped!

T: surmises the Chechnian refugee was mind-controlled -

- Of Mohammad: he is not gone; made his transition and is now back to help discussion about the names of Mohammad and Maitraia

- From Sweet Angelique: explained the continued drama about people who are homeless, refugees, due to land grabs and fake wars carried out in countries where the IMF and other controllers have a short leash on the countries –

[John Perkins' book Confession of an Economic Hitman explains how it is done]

- another thing: Erdogan has recently discovered, talking about, ancient tunnels from Edinburgh, Scotland to Ankara and Istanbul in Turkey. They went inside the tunnels and found artifacts that go back to the Annunaki wars going on on the surface; different cultures of people on earth at the time were going through a all sorts of things.
 - Erdogan found off world technologies that are still functioning and are not to be used for darkness
 - the tunnels go back 13,000 years – there was no Mediterranean Sea until a certain time [when?] - wasn't there in Atlantis
 - Certain parts of the tunnels are completely circular – look like polished marble or sphere – can walk for thousands of miles.
- Both the Forces of Light and the Forces of Dark know about those tunnels and Erdogan is trying to use this to enhance his position in the world
- And this is tied in with Sudan - Sudan and Israel just signed a peace agreement, and the Palestinians call it a stab in the back. Erdogan is one of the crazy players in this story who wants to play out the Armageddon story – S A the Cat said – 'Leave it there: Armageddon etc is cancelled!'

T: a book called The First Americans Were Africans: Document Evidence by David Imhotep, PhD – reads info from back page

R: the original mound builders were tiny little black people: hobbits. Talks of those in Lord of the Rings who found swords

- Brings up Black Panther and vibranium which is a real thing – controllers don't want us to know we never needed to get old or sick or die

T: reads some parts of the book – not sure which – relationship between the Celts and those on the American continents

RB: reading about lynx medicine because Rama has a bobcat mama and 2 babies in the backyard with the 2 cats and the rabbits! ! !

- Lynx is not the guardian of secrets but the knower of secrets.

Audio: Findhorn Foundation An Important Message from the Trees, Dorothy Maclean

<https://youtu.be/SOUMwpybds>

2020-10-28 An Important Message from the Tree Spirits via Dorothy Maclean

Findhorn Foundation and Community Co-founder, Dorothy Maclean, recalls an important message for humanity and the Earth which she received from a small cypress tree in the garden at the community in Findhorn.

We come in with a lordly sweep, for we are not just the small trees that you see in your garden. We are denizens of magnificent spaces of great hills in the sun and the wind. We put up with being hedges, but always in our inner being it this growing toward the open sun-kissed places where we stand in clustered grandeur.

You feel in us an almost intolerable longing to be fully ourselves. We of the plant world have our pattern and destiny, worked out through the ages, and we feel it quite wrong that we and others like us are not allowed to be because of humans and their encroachment. Trees are not so much doers of the world as be-ers. We have our portion of the plan to fulfill; we have been nurtured for this very reason, and now, in this day and age, many of us can only dream of the spaces where we can fulfill ourselves. The pattern is ever before us, out of reach, a dream that we are forever growing towards, but which seldom becomes reality. The planet needs the likes of us in our full maturity. We are not a mistake on the part of Nature; we have our work to do.

Man is now becoming controller of the world forests and is beginning to realise that these are needed, but uses silly economic reasons for his selection with no awareness at all of the planet's needs. He should not cover acres with one quick growing species, which though admittedly better than none, shows the ignorance of the purpose of trees and their channeling of diverse forces.

The world needs us on a large scale. Perhaps if man were in tune with the infinite, as we are, and were pulling his weight, the forces would be balanced. But at present the planet needs more than ever just what it is destroying – the forces that go through the stately trees. We have been vehement. Here are these facts of life, forever with us, and no-one has listened to them.

Though you feel at one with us you feel unable to help. You are only looking at it from a limited view. We know that the very telling of this to you does help – that a truth once in human consciousness then percolates around and does its work. And we feel better for communicating. Let us both believe that the almighty one knows better than either of us and that something is being done.

Recorded at the 3rd World Wilderness Conference in 1983.

Speak Your Affirmations

Speak your truth out loud and affirm things that you believe are within your potential. They become reality, and the more you affirm them to yourself, the more real they will become. Repeat your affirmations every day. I dare you! – KRYON

Personal insight from Lee:

I love it when Kryon “dares you.” Kryon is a wise master when it comes to what Humans think and do. This is his way of saying, “I know you probably won’t do this unless I dare you to.” Spirit knows the biases and shortcomings of all of us, and often uses these specifically to bring us to an enlightened place that we would not have gotten to otherwise.

When you receive this card, it’s like a loud voice reminding you of your strength and the ability to create your own reality in your life. Affirmations are the catalyst for change, since they push the envelope of energy around you and bend reality, defining it to match what you are affirming. Kryon says, “Speak your truth out loud.” This is so you will hear it and really believe it’s true. Kryon says, “Do it every day!” This is so we won’t forget the basic truth that we are magnificent!

If you got this card ... I dare you to speak your truth – out loud – right now!
“I AM MAGNIFICENT IN THE EYES OF GOD.”

NOTE: IT CAME TO AN ABRUPT END – not quite complete!

Like in an interrogation,
 My resistance is being broken,
 Helping the investigation,
 Expose the root of the problem.

"Welcome to the first quarter Sun square Moon, Friday, October 23rd, when the Sun enters 0° Scorpio 35' and the Moon enters 0° Aquarius 35'. The Moon will continue to wax (grow larger) for eight more days until becoming full a week from Saturday at 8° Taurus 38'.

This first quarter phase begins with the Moon still conjunct the Capricorn stellium and, by association, forming a T-square with Black Moon Lilith, Uranus, and Eris, which are opposing the Sun and Mercury. In itself, the first quarter Moon is an intense turning point in the cycle even without all this other "action." There is a need for the soul to break free from past conditioning to manifest the seed intention that was sown with the new Moon (last week). It is a time of dealing with our fears and insecurities to step forth with new ideas, intentions, relationships, etc.

We can expect a very intense weekend with surprises of a sudden, extreme nature that may serve to tear us away from the past, whether or not we feel like "breaking free." The advice is to use this psychic, emotional energy in the most positive way to liberate yourself and others from external people, beliefs, or conditioning that is boxing you in. Though it may be scary, it will be best to gather up your courage, embrace the change, and go into the unknown. You may be more ready than you think.

The temperature continues to rise throughout the week as the Sun nears opposition to Uranus and conjuncts Mercury. La Luna heads through Aquarius and Pisces, which are the two signs most "out of personal control." I often relate to them as Divine Intelligence agents that create what may appear to our ego-minds as chaos but actually has deeper, hidden significance (truth) behind it. Fortunately, Venus transits into Libra, one of her home signs, and approaches an opposition with Chiron. She highlights this week as an opportunity for healing our wounded, broken hearts and relationships as she also trines Pluto and then Saturn.

Just as the pressure of water building up behind the dam is released when it is opened, so too can our hearts and lives release the stress and tension when we open them. Take the risk and share your heart's wishes and dreams. It will leave you vulnerable and fragile but can lead to miraculous wonders of healing and future joy!"

Yup, that's Scorpio! I thought that I could just as easily make a playlist per week instead of just a song. I'm thinking, "Take Another Little Piece of My Heart," by Joplin, or how about "When I Break Down" by Alan Parsons Project? For sure, "The Boxer" by Simon and Garfunkel. I'll put links below.

What more can I say that hasn't already been said? Don't feel alone. With Mars and Mercury, both retrograde nobody is goin' anywhere, LOL! Another saying that comes to mind is, "You can run, but you can't hide," some western movie I think. Still, it feels like we're treading water (or getting waterboarded) until we drop our defenses, excuses, denials, lies, coverups, masks, pretensions, fabrications, misrepresentations, and all other forms of BS and come to the table (of Life).

It may just not be that bad, maybe hurt for a little bit, but when we lay it all down, we will also lighten our load and fly higher! Go for it!

As the world rushes toward the brink of biospheric collapse, many people are now looking to traditional Indigenous wisdom for guidance on how to live sustainably.

Yet Stan Rushworth, a professor of Native American Studies and an elder of Cherokee descent, believes a different kind of wisdom is revealed once there's a willingness to face the truth about genocide and loss of right relationship to the rest of life.

2020-10-24 With the Hunter Biden Expose, Suppression is a Bigger Scandal Than The Actual Story

<https://taibbi.substack.com/p/with-the-hunter-biden-expose-suppression-136>

Unprecedented efforts to squelch information about a New York Post story may prove to be more dangerous corruption than whatever Hunter Biden did with a crooked Ukrainian energy company

The incredible decision by Twitter and Facebook to block access to a New York Post story about a cache of emails reportedly belonging to Democratic nominee Joe Biden's son Hunter, with Twitter going so far as to lock the 200 year-old newspaper out of its own account for over a week, continues to be a major underreported scandal.

The hypocrisy is mind-boggling. Imagine the reaction if that same set of facts involved the New York Times and any of its multitudinous unverifiable "exposes" from the last half-decade: from the similarly-leaked "black ledger" story implicating Paul Manafort, to its later-debunked "repeated contacts with Russian intelligence" story, to its mountain of articles about the far more dubious Steele dossier. Internet platforms for years have balked at intervening at many other sensational "unverified" stories, including ones called into question in very short order:

The flow of information in the United States has become so politicized – bottlenecked by an increasingly brazen union of corporate press and tech platforms – that it's become impossible for American audiences to see news about certain topics absent thickets of propagandistic contextualizing. Try to look up anything about Burisma, Joe Biden, or Hunter Biden in English, however, and you're likely to be shown a pile of "fact-checks" and explainers ahead of the raw information:

The screenshot shows a Google search interface with the query "biden ukraine billion aid". The search results are filtered to "Videos". The first result is from www.usatoday.com, dated 2020/10/21, titled "Fact check: Joe Biden leveraged Ukraine aid to oust corrupt ...". The video thumbnail shows Joe Biden and has a duration of 1:14. The description states: "Despite a Senate GOP investigation that found no wrongdoing by Joe Biden on foreign policy in Ukraine ... 2 days ago". The second result is from www.washingtonpost.com, dated 2019/10/02, titled "Correcting a media error: Biden's Ukraine showdown was in ...". The video thumbnail shows Joe Biden and has a duration of 5:29. The description states: "Many news organizations have reported former vice president Joe Biden traveled to Kiev in March, 2016. But ... Oct 2, 2019". The third result is from www.washingtonpost.com, dated 2019/09/23, titled "Fact-checking Trump's latest claims on Biden and Ukraine ...". The video thumbnail shows Joe Biden and has a duration of 1:37. The description states: "The president levels new charges against former vice president Joe Biden. We dissect his claims and find them ... Sep 23, 2019". The fourth result is from www.usatoday.com, dated 2019/10/03, titled "What really happened when Biden forced out Ukraine's top ...". The video thumbnail shows Joe Biden and has a duration of 1:05. The description states: "But sources ranging from former Obama administration officials to an anti-corruption advocate in Ukraine say ... Oct 3, 2019". The fifth result is from www.facebook.com, dated Jan 23, 2020, titled "The White House - Joe Biden: 'If the prosecutor is not fired ...". The video thumbnail shows Joe Biden and has a duration of 0:30. The description states: "Two years ago today, Joe Biden shares how, as Vice President, he threatened to withhold aid to Ukraine ... Jan 23, 2020".

Other true information has been scrubbed or de-ranked, either by platforms or by a confederation of press outlets whose loyalty to the Democratic Party far now overshadows its obligations to inform.

Obviously, Fox is not much better, in terms of its willingness to report negative information about Trump and Republicans, but Fox doesn't have the reach that this emerging partnership between mass media, law enforcement, and tech platforms does. That group's reaction to the New York Post story is formalizing a decision to abandon the media's old true/untrue standard for a different test that involves other, more politicized questions, like provenance and editorial intent.

Take the example of the taped conversations between Joe Biden and former Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko, which Ukrainian parliamentarian Andrei Derkach has been rolling out in press conferences for some time now.

Derkach is a highly suspicious character to say the least, a man even Rudy Giuliani assessed as having a "50/50" chance of being a Russian agent. He has for some time now been disseminating information that is clearly beneficial to Russian interests.

Nonetheless, the Biden/Poroshenko recordings he's released appear to be real. Still, Atlantic columnist Edward-Isaac Dovey this summer bragged about how media members learned their lesson after the experience of 2016, when (real) emails from the DNC suspected of being hacked by Russians were released by Wikileaks. The correct path instead is for a priesthood of "mainstream" outlets to assess whether or not the material has enough news value to publish:

It's hard not to feel some déjà vu here. In 2016, Russian intelligence agents hacked the emails of Democratic National Committee staffers and Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman, John Podesta, and delivered them to WikiLeaks, as a way to get them into the American media. Some outlets learned a lesson from that episode, and have treated new Biden recordings out of Ukraine with care...

Most mainstream-media outlets have decided that the recordings that have emerged so far offer "little new insight into Biden's actions in Ukraine," as The Washington Post's Carol Morello wrote after the recordings were first released.

However they came to reach the public, the Biden-Poroshenko tapes are a newsworthy window into how America leverages its power to impact the lives of every single person in countries like Ukraine. One amazing exchange came on May 16, 2016, when Poroshenko pleaded with Biden to approve an aid package:

Poroshenko: I think that within the last three weeks, we demonstrate real great progress in the sphere of reforms. We voted in the parliament for 100% tariffs despite the fact that the IMF expected only 75%... We are launching reform for the prices for medicine, removing all the obstacles.

Biden: I agree.

Poroshenko was telling Joe Biden that in order to get an American aid package, he'd gone beyond even what the I.M.F. asked for and raised energy prices for ordinary Ukrainians not by 75%, but by 100%, as well as taking steps to curtail subsidized medicine prices.

This is clearly newsworthy, but the few outlets like the Washington Post that even bothered to report on these tapes only did so to convey their distaste for the source, and to relay news that the Biden camp believed it all to be "a continuation of a long-standing Russian effort to hurt the former vice president."

Press outlets began some time ago to describe such material as “misinformation” or “disinformation,” even though items like the Derkach tapes (or the leaked calls between State Department officials Victoria Nuland and Geoffrey Pyatt discussing who should be Ukraine’s interim leader after the Euromaidan revolution) are neither. By definition, both terms normally require an element of “false information.”

In one recent AP story, reporters spent more time asking Twitter and Facebook why they’d allowed material from the Derkach tapes to be spread than they did weighing the truth of the information in the tapes. Their conclusion was a warning from “disinformation fellow” Nina Jankowicz from the “non-partisan Wilson Center,” about Twitter and Facebook rules that allowed some of this information through:

That’s a loophole foreign and domestic troublemakers are inclined to continue exploiting before Election Day, Jankowicz said.

“If you get a piece of information in the hands of the right American, it can absolutely spin out of control and make the national news in a couple of days,” she said.

Connecticut Senator Senator Chris Murphy, racing past Adam Schiff in his candidacy to become this era’s more odorless and colorless version of McCarthy, went even further this week, telling CNN that Russian disinformation efforts are “more problematic” than in 2016. He said this was because “this time around, the Russians have decided to cultivate U.S. citizens as assets. They are attempting to try to spread their propaganda in the mainstream media.”

Note that unlike the Derkach tapes, where the foreign interference issue is obvious, the New York Post material hasn’t been conclusively tied to Russia (it has also been denied by the Director of National Intelligence, not that blue-state audiences care). Nonetheless, politicians and pundits alike freely make such accusations.

In an interview with Yahoo!’s “On the Move” program, anchor Adam Shapiro became one of the only members of the press — think of how shameful that is — to ask a prominent Democrat to make a statement about the veracity of the New York Post story. Shapiro asked Murphy:

Even if it’s an outright lie, or Russian... some kind of interference... We haven’t heard the Bidens say it’s absolutely not true. We haven’t heard Hunter Biden say that or the Senator say that. Do they need to say that?

To which Murphy replied, “I mean, what a victory for Russian propaganda, that we’re talking about this right now.” He went on to non-answer the question, which has essentially been declared illegitimate, by the press first of all. The least curious people in the country right now appear to be the credentialed news media, a situation normally unique to tinpot authoritarian societies.

If the problem is “American citizens” being cultivated as “assets” trying to put “interference” in the mainstream media, the logical next step is to start asking Internet platforms to shut down accounts belonging to any American journalist with the temerity to report material leaked by foreigners (the wrong foreigners, of course – it will continue to be okay to report things like the “black ledger”). From Fox or the Daily Caller on the right, to left-leaning outlets like Consortium or the World Socialist Web Site, to writers like me even – we’re all now clearly in range of new speech restrictions, even if we stick to long-ago-established factual standards.

As has been hinted at by several prominent journalists, controversies erupted within newsrooms across New York and Washington in the last week. Editors have been telling charges that any effort to determine whether or not the Biden laptop material is true, or to ask the Biden campaign to confirm or deny the story, will either not be allowed or put through heightened fact-checking procedures.

On the other hand, if you want to assert without any evidence at all that the New York Post story is Russian interference, you can essentially go straight into print.

Many people on the liberal side of the political aisle don't have a problem with this, focused as they are on the upcoming Trump-Biden election. But this same press corps might be weeks away from assuming responsibility for challenging a Biden administration. If they've already calculated once that a true story may be buried for political reasons because the other "side" is worse, they will surely make that same calculation again.

What happens a month from now when an ambitious Republican like Tom Cotton leaks a document damaging to a President-Elect Biden? Or two years from now, if in the weeks before midterm elections, we get bad economic news, or a Biden/Harris administration foreign policy initiative takes a turn for the worse? Are we sure those stories will be run?

The Republican version of Burisma story – essentially, that former General Prosecutor Viktor Shokin was Elliott Ness, and Joe Biden intervened to fire him specifically to aid his son's company – is also not supported by evidence. What Trump lawyer Rudy Giuliani and his cohorts have done to date is take a few unreported or under-reported facts and leap straight to a maximalist interpretation of corruption on Joe Biden's part.

This isn't right, but the room to make that argument has been created by the ongoing squelching of information coming from Ukraine. The suppression story is almost certainly a bigger scandal than the Hunter Biden affair itself, but it's all become part of the same picture.

As I learned from sources in Ukraine this week, the biggest misconception has to do with the question of whether or not investigations of Burisma were ongoing at the time of Joe Biden's intervention in 2015.

Christian Parenti: We could do worse than looking back at our own history and being honest about how the First Industrial Revolution in the United States took place and it was not by letting the market do its thing. It was not by allowing entrepreneurs to have their way. It was by having a government that was capable and strong enough to step in, get prices wrong, you know, use tariffs and subsidies. Ban certain imports, ban certain exports and use all these tools to guide the economy through a transition which happened successfully. And so we have to do a version of that again.

Chris Hedges: Alexander Hamilton, popularized by the musical Hamilton, was the first Treasury Secretary of the United States. He has been called the founding father of capitalism and imperialism but Hamilton was far more complex than a simple advocate for a market-driven economy. Christian Parenti and his new book Radical Hamilton argues that his ideas for the US economy were distorted or ignored by the capitalist elites.

Parenti goes back to Hamilton's neglected masterpiece, Report On Manufactures, and The Federalist Papers to rescue Hamilton's radical ideas for political economy, ideas that are especially important in an age of near total domination of our economic and political systems by the reigning capitalist elites. Joining me to discuss his new book, Radical Hamilton, is Christian Parenti, Associate Professor of Economics at John Jay College, City University of New York, and the author of five books including his prescient book Tropic of Chaos, Climate Change, and The New Geography of Violence which we discussed in a previous show.

You open the book at the beginning by quoting two passages from Sigmund Freud's Civilization and Its Discontents. And I think you're trying to send a message that Hamilton understood human nature, the dark side of human nature. Freud says that the neighbor is not only a possible helper or sexual object, but also temptation to gratify aggressiveness, exploit his capacity for work without recompense, use him sexually without his consent, seize his possessions, humiliate him, cause him pain, torture and kill him. And then this second passage about the battle between Eros and Thanatos. Those forces of--the forces of death and the forces of life which Freud argues are within every individual and every society. And I think you are setting us up for Hamilton's view of human nature which I also ascribe to and I suppose you do. But explain that.

CP: Yeah, I mean, those two quotes get at something eternal, right, that the self-destructive quality of human beings and in relationship to Hamilton's situation, right? I'm trying to kind of get at the risk that was always involved. The American Revolution, like any political project, was always contingent. It's hard to remember that now that the United States is this huge bloated empire and, you know, a plutocracy run by this absolutely, you know, filthy rich one percent. But at the time of the Revolution, it was this tenuous political project, like so many political projects, tenuous.

And the way it actually succeeded, regardless of what it becomes, but the way that it actually succeeded I think has lessons for us today. One, because we're trying to create an economic transition off of fossil fuels, and part of what Hamilton does in the face of all of these destructive and self-destructive forces, the centrifugal forces that are pulling these 13 former colonies, now states, apart, has to bind all that, this kind of, you know, that's Thanatos at work, to bring you back to the Freud quote. And it has to essentially institutionalize Eros and pull all of these pieces together and get everyone -despite their hostility towards each other and their venality - to get everyone involved to coalesce around a coherent project. And he manages to do that.

Not him alone obviously but he plays a very important role in doing that. And I know for a lot of Left listeners and viewers who are critics of American empire, it's going to be hard to sort of make the leap but what I'm asking readers to do is sort of not import the present into the story of the American Revolution, but to see it for what it was at that time. And it was contingent and the 13 colonies were held together by a very weak constitution. The Articles of Confederation. And it was not working. And so there's the project of creating a new constitution. We know this story.

But buried within that is also creating a state that has the means to plan economically, creating a state that can be an economic player. And this is the set of insights in--from Hamilton that gets lost in most of the literature; the vast majority of literature on Hamilton sees him as this adherent of the free market, this fan of Adam Smith, and in fact, the opening passages of the Report On Manufactures begin with an attack on Adam Smith. And basically Hamilton says, look, the free market is good if you're already dominant. The free market and free trade are good if you're Britain. But for us, we can't let the market do its thing. We have to violate the rules of the market. We have to plan and we have to use government power and everything from tariffs to public ownership to steer this economy in a desired direction. And that desired direction was away from dependence on agriculture and towards mixed economy with a large industrial element to it. They didn't use the word industrial. They referred to manufacturing but this was a transition that had to happen for the state to have the wealth to defend itself and to develop the economy further.

And this was not going to happen all by itself. It had to be pursued consciously by the government. So what appealed to me about that was that this is similar, very different in many ways, but also somewhat similar to what we face now. We have to get off of fossil fuels and get on to clean energy. This is essentially a project of re-industrialization. Green re-industrialization. Well, how are we going to do this? We could do worse than looking back at our own history and being honest about how the First Industrial Revolution in the United States took place, and it was not by letting the market do its thing. It was not by allowing entrepreneurs to have their way. It was by having a government that was capable and strong enough to step in, get prices wrong, you know, use tariffs and subsidies, ban certain imports, ban certain exports, and use all these tools to guide the economy through a transition which happened successfully. And so we have to do a version of that again.

CH: Well, there were a couple things that were interesting. One, he didn't trust the power of the states and in the book, you write about how it's a fallacy to somehow believe that local empowerment, local government is a protection against despotism. You had a series of rebellion, Shays' Rebellion - which you write about in the book, but other rebellions that rose up, and I think you make a very cogent argument that without strong centralized government, these warring state factions--I mean, New York I think almost went to war against Vermont as you write - would've rent the country apart but also--and I think that's why you focus on that document, which other--like, Chernow and others who've written about Hamilton, pass over is he didn't trust capitalists either.

CP: Yes, he--I mean, he wanted to keep these elites close and bring them into the game. He's pretty--he's amoral, you know. He's not--he's not an egalitarian, he's not a Leftist, right? He is a kind of pragmatic, ruthless realist. And in terms of elites, the classic portrayal of the crisis around this time is that, you know, the constitution amounts to a sort of power grab by elites away from the more Democratic states. But if you actually look at the state constitutions, many of them were much more reactionary than the American Constitution. They had gendered restrictions. They had racial restrictions on voting. There's none of that in the Federal Constitution, to the extent that states are continued by the Federal Constitution to control elections. That's why you have racist election laws, et cetera.

So there's a number of ways in which that the new constitution created in 1787 at Philadelphia was actually more progressive than the state constitutions. And you look at, well, who controlled these state governments? It's just assumed that because they're smaller, the people had more access to them. Sometimes that's true, but very often it's not true at all. These state governments were controlled by local elite gangs of merchants, and planters, and large landlords and they were just local self-dealing gangs. And Hamilton saw that and he really disliked and feared the parochial agenda of these local elites. And so there is an element of a kind of inter-elite rivalry going on in the--in the creation of the constitution and then its passage.

And in terms of the critical period leading up to the constitution, what happens is, I mean, there's almost civil war. I mean, there is essentially a brief civil war in Massachusetts during Shays' Rebellion but there are also--there's wars up and down the frontier with Native American groups. There are--there's a war against self-liberated formerly enslaved people living in maroon colonies in--on the border of South Carolina and Georgia. There are intra-settler wars between rival groups of White settlers in Eastern Tennessee and also in the Wyoming Valley of Pennsylvania. An on and off shooting war between poor and middle class settlers, rival groups of them each backed by rival elite speculators. So the whole thing was like, you know, falling apart, spinning out of control.

States were beginning to have trade wars with each other, imposing tariffs on each other. And the culmination is Shays' Rebellion which is a tax rebellion. The states have gone heavily into debt to fight the revolution. And Congress is also in debt. And so the effort to pay off this debt amounts to shaking down the populace. And in Massachusetts, the situation was that most of the debt had been consolidated in the hands of about 35 men on the coast. And they were squeezing the farmers and foreclosing on their farms, and so the farmers organized in the late summer of 1786 which also interestingly, there's a climate angle to this story: the critical period as the 1780's are known also involves major volcanic eruptions in 1783 in Japan and in Iceland. And in Iceland, it goes on for an entire year. And this is linked over the following couple of years with a cooling trend in the northeast. So you've got really wet cold summers and harsh winters and that's also turning up the volume on all these conflicts on the frontier and it's a crucial part of Shays' Rebellion.

So these farmers in Western Massachusetts are being squeezed to pay these exorbitant taxes which are, you know, going to pay off the bonds owned now by these elites. Their crops are failing because of this climate stuff, and so they organize and they shut down the courts. The state government mobilizes the militia. The militia generally either switches sides or just refuses to fight and dissolves away. So then the state government raises a private fund and creates a private army to go after the Shays' rebels - named Shays' for Daniel Shays who was one of their leaders. They actually called themselves Regulators. And there are two major battles and lots of, you know, sniping, and ambushes, and assassinations, stuff like that. And Shays' Rebellion is being wrapped up literally as the constitutional convention in Philadelphia begins in the spring, May of 1787. And the end result of that government that is created, it's a brokered government. It's not perfect by any means.

But one thing it does achieve through Hamilton's interventions is that it does lower taxes on the average person. And it doesn't do that by smashing and liquidating the parasitic elites. That would've been nice but that was really not, you know, that was not where Hamilton's head was at. He was not a socialist. He was a modernizer. But what was done was he roped them into the project of successfully building a national credit system. And central to this is a bank which is 20% owned by the government and he ties elites into supporting this government debt. And he does this by using the federal government's powers to assume all of the debts of the states which then to buy those debts from them. First, the government - the Federal Government - borrows money abroad and then it pays the states at face value for their debts. And this re-inflates the state economies. And then, instead of trying to pay off the debt, Hamilton creates what he calls a funded debt which is government debt that bears interest, so if you - if you lend your money to the government, you're going to get six percent a year. And this actually stabilizes prices, stabilizes the system, and elites who might otherwise attack the state financially see it as essentially the bedrock of a financial system that they're going to benefit from. And so it's not an egalitarian project but it's a project of stabilization.

CH: But it ties the--it gives the elites a self-interest, of course, in the central government. When we come back, we'll continue our conversation with Christian Parenti, the author of Radical Hamilton.

Welcome back. We continue our conversation with Christian Parenti, the author of Radical Hamilton. So, against Hamilton, you have the planner class, Jefferson perhaps being the best-known figure who eventually becomes President. Hamilton is killed in a duel with Aaron Burr of course. And you used the Jeffersonian period to really show how he, of course, rolled back much of what Hamilton had done. And you talk about the War of 1812, but to really show how prescient Hamilton was in terms of holding the country together, can you talk about that period and talk a little bit about the War of 1812 as well.

CP: Uh-hmm. Yeah. So the Revolution of 1800 is what Jefferson's election is called. And he represents the planter elite. And they are opposed to this new Federal Government for a number of reasons: one, they're worried from the very beginning that it's going to come after slavery. And John Rutledge of South Carolina actually says that at the constitution - at the constitutional convention when the question of the slave trade is being debated. And he says, "Hey, let's not even debate this. This - you know, the only thing on, you know, that the Northern States should be concerned with is interest. Don't bring up morality. If you start going after slavery, the South is out of here."

So they were worried that this strong Federal Government would come after slavery because Vermont, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and New York were all on the road to or had - some of them had already abolished slavery.

The other thing was they didn't want their property taxed - their land and slaves. And so when Jefferson comes in in 1800, he eliminates all of these internal taxes. And this totally transforms government finance. The federal government is taking in about $300 million a year and it's reduced to about $50 million a year after Jefferson eliminates all these taxes. This is often cast as a progressive thing that he does because liquor and newspapers are taxed, but what's often left out is that also carriages were taxed, houses were taxed, slaves were taxed, i.e. the elite and their property were getting taxed. And Southerners did - elite Southerners didn't like that. And they were--even though they came from the poorest part of the country, the richest people in the country up to the civil war were always Southerners, these very wealthy plantation owners. So Jefferson gets rid of all these taxes and he starts cutting back the navy, and the military, and the administrative apparatus of the state, doesn't want to get involved in building canals, internal improvements, rejects this whole developmentalist project of, you know, subsidizing economic development.

And there's a contradiction here because I'd love to cut the military budget now. But at that time it was this, you know, post-colonial experiment. So lo and behold, you know, the great empires, Spanish, French, and English, are pressing in on the US, particularly the British. And they start boarding American ships, arresting American sailors. And this gets so bad that Jefferson, after his two terms, his understudy, Madison becomes president. And Madison declares war against the British. And lo and behold, having, you know, having achieved their small government revolution, what they get is this total crisis. So they--the Madison administration declares war: it's unable to fight this war in the way that it imagines it's going to. The British come in and they burn Washington DC to the ground; they burn the Capitol building, and they burn the White House. And it was, you know, only because the British were exhausted from fighting the French, really pretty much constantly since the 1750s on they had been fighting the French, and they were just kind of broken exhausted and that's why they didn't recolonize the US. And it struck me as a perfect example of this pattern that Polanyi writes about. And I've mentioned Polanyi in the beginning of the book. And I...

CH: Yeah.

CP: You're a Polanyi fan as I recall. I mean...

CH: Yes, I am. Yeah.

CP: ...Polanyi makes this point that in, you know, from the very beginning, capitalism has this pattern where it produces an elite that resists state control. They don't want to pay taxes, they don't want to be regulated. And this elite that are pushing for free market economics inevitably win some victories. Those victories inevitably produce a crisis, and that crisis inevitably requires a return of planning, a return of government, and that's exactly what happens with the War of 1812.

The War of 1812 is a disaster and it's borne out of this small government laissez-faire ideology; the crisis that it produces requires a return to Hamiltonian interventionist, developmentalist economics. They reconstitute the Central Bank which is partly owned by the government and they have to, you know, in--again embrace the whole agenda of developing the economy, regardless of what their ideology is.

And we see that again and again, right? We just saw 2008 and again with the COVID crisis where you have these hardcore free market economists in charge of the--of the Fed and the Treasury. And then there's this economic crisis, and they throw their ideology out the window because they realize the only thing that's actually going to stabilize this system is government intervention, you know, socializing these--the--socializing the losses and even, you know, in the case of the COVID, stimulus, even doing this dreaded thing of giving people money, right? Putting money in the hands of the working class. If they don't do that, the whole thing was going to melt down.

CH: Let me ask a question because - so you had - throughout American history, the crisis you mentioned going all the way through to The Great Depression, 2008, the COVID crisis, but in the recent history, one, of course we have a bloated military, and number two, the crisis has not been used to put money into the hands of the working class and the people who are suffering but has been used to further consolidate both the wealth and the power of the reigning one percent. And I want you to talk about this period and juxtapose it to previous periods of distress.

CP: Well, I mean there wasn't--it wasn't that there was no money, right? I mean, there was this six--extra six hundred dollars and it's a--it shows how poor Americans are, that what little money from the, you know, the huge intervention by the government that did reach the, you know, the working class actually had a tremendous effect, people's personal savings went up, and it's a huge part of why the economy didn't go into a total tailspin.

The economy is a complete mess but unemployment has come down from its high. I mean this has to do with the fact that people have had some money as opposed to none at all. There's been also, you know, an eviction moratorium, student debt moratorium. Now, these things are totally inadequate but they're not nothing, right? And the vast majority of the intervention was just about, you know, buying debts from zombie companies.

I mean, what we've got now is like JCPenney, a company that shouldn't exist: it's essentially a Ponzi Scheme. It borrows money to pay off its old debts. And now the Federal Reserve is buying debt, buying corporate bonds from companies like JCPenney, just putting them on life support. So it's a, kind of, like, you know, there's a--there's a crypto hidden in plain sight, crypto nationalization of the financial sector essentially is what's going on.

So that's unfortunate and it's a waste of money, and it supports firms that should be transformed. And, you know, if rescued for - and put to better purposes. So, you asked about, you know - implicit was - sort of what could be done with a crisis like this. And I mean the - a real response that would get us out of this crisis would have to be one that would write off the value of, you know, fossil fuel assets and pour vast amounts of public money into building out a new clean energy sector and, along the way, requiring that this be done at union wages, et cetera, et cetera.

And I think that that is going to happen. I think that this Polanyian cycle of crisis that forces the state back in is underway. And you see it in California for example, around insurance. You know, the insurance industry wants to just get out of insuring homes in fire prone areas. And the state can't allow that to happen, so the state is either going to have to force the insurance industry to stay in there or the state itself is going to have to start insuring people because you can't have a functional economy in California if, you know, homeowners can't protect their homes.

CH: You write that the economic story of the war, you're talking about the revolutionary war, confirms a disturbing truth both capitalism and the modern fiscal military state emerge from the furnace of war. Explain that idea.

CP: Well, the - there's a -there's an insight in Adam Smith and though Hamilton was critical of Smith: he lost the point of Smith, you know, - [that] any state, when war comes, needs a line of credit because the vast cost of war can't be met from the regular budget. So states have to, in the face of war, go into debt. And that alone means they have to build up a relationship with creditors. And so this leads to the creation of a fiscal military state, a state that can tax and spend but also borrow and pay its debts. That is driven by the need of a state to build out a massive military. And in--that's the theory.

And in fact that is exactly what happens again and again. So, the reason the United States creates a fiscal military state, a large powerful central state that can tax and spend but also borrow and pay off its debts, is precisely because it is threatened in the international state system by other states. And so the impetus, sadly, for developmentalism, again and again, is that one state is threatened. The weaker state is threatened by a more powerful state. And generally what happens is that the weaker state successfully builds some sort of fiscal military state that is a developmentalist state, that can drive an economic transformation, that can take an agrarian economy and industrialize it in a hothouse fashion. It either does that or it fails to do that and, if it fails, it will be formally or informally colonized and remain underdeveloped.

And so the US successfully does this defensive developmentalism. That model is then copied by Germany: Friedrich List is over here in the US in the 1820s. He's very impressed by this developmentalist model in which the state plays a central role in driving the economic transformation. These are Hamilton's ideas: they're known as the American system. List takes them to Germany where they become known as the national system. When Japan is threatened in the 1850s by foreign intervention, there's a revolution in 1868, the Meiji Restoration, and the ideas are brought in from Germany and very influential on the whole Japanese model of developmentalist capitalism, and then from there to South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and today China as well.

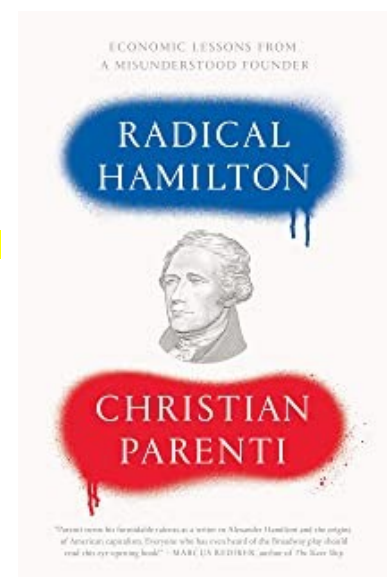

So this is - the real story of capitalist industrialization is not one of free markets but it's one of interventionist states that protect with tariffs. They subsidize, they control trade, they nationalize - at least in part or in many cases totally - nationalized finance, and they plan. They don't let the market and prices do their thing. They force the market and the price signal into the channels that will lead towards politically desirable ends.

CH: Great. We got to stop there. Thank you. That was Christian Parenti.

CP: And the reason that's important is because we live in denial of that.

CH: Yes. Completely. That was Christian Parenti, author of Radical Hamilton.

2020-10-23 A Message to Lightworkers – October 23, 2020 by Caroline Oceana Ryan

This week's guidance from the Ascended Masters, Galactics, Earth Elements, Fae Elders, Angelic legions, and Archangels known as the Collective:

Greetings, dear ones! We are very pleased to have this opportunity to speak with you today.

We wish to speak to those whose countries are experiencing political unrest and division, for this is a time in which the energies of divisiveness and opposition are being magnified for the purposes of weakening humanity's collective sense of itself—its unity consciousness.

Be aware that the divisiveness would not be so sharp and so obvious if it were not for certain groups realizing "what time it is" in the greater sense.

The energies of Divine Justice are streaming onto the Earth in increasing levels now, as humanity begins to experience an increased desire for sovereignty, clarity of vision, and independent thought.

The veils that once the true status of Earth life from most people have dissolved, leaving them with two choices: Cling desperately to the lies you are still being told by mainstream channels of information, or allow yourself to see what has been hiding behind a cloak of respectability for thousands of years, and claim your sovereignty.

The idea that there is no "master race" such as you have been taught for millennia, is a frightening idea to those who have invested in their connection to a supposed master race and to patriarchal rule in general.

In addition to these pressures, we see your struggle with the idea that perhaps only half of your population seems to be awakening to truths so long hidden.

Yet we assure you that recently it became more than half of Earth's people who have stepped into the Light, to one degree or another.

This has thrown the old powers-that-were into a bit of a tailspin.

Fearing they will never recover from that loss of control, they have planned one interesting development or another, to maintain at least their control over human mental constructs, if nothing else.

That comes in the form of baiting you into fear reactions, by creating situations that can feel frightening to anyone—increasing forms of imprisonment, putting uniformed personnel on the streets who ignore civil rights, drastically worsened social and economic conditions—the list goes on.

And yet, we may say, “We don’t worry for you,” as you are all coming into forms of consciousness that link you to the now fully activated crystalline energy grid far more powerfully than you are linked to the remains of a crumbling matrix.

And so—what does this mean?

It means that your way of seeing the world and dealing with the stresses before you have drastically changed.

They’ve been lifted to a higher perspective and more into vibrational alignment with your higher self, so that the old catastrophes and threatening scenarios no longer have the effects they once had.

It means that you are beginning to remember your own co-Creative powers, and to invest in that knowledge in both your waking and sleeping states, contacting members of your soul family to assist you in moving your Earth mission up to a whole new, higher, more potent level.

It means that even when you feel there is “no way out” for the culture you live in, you know intuitively that a higher vibrational set of events awaits you and millions of others.

And that the effects of that will flow outward to eventually lift the life conditions of everyone on the planet.

And it means that even as you read this, a part of you has known this all along.

And so we would encourage you to seek calm, to seek solace, to seek quiet within right now with this knowledge—embedded with frequencies to assist each of you on your individual paths.

Use it when you feel intimidated or unsure of outer events, or angered at the beliefs and illusionary conclusions that others have come to.

Use it when you feel shocked at the depth of lies coming from some news outlets, and the celebration of some supposed left-of-center groups and theories, which you know in your heart to be part of the old system, however it may masquerade as a new system.

Use it when you see the word NESARA misused and misrepresented, in ways far from its original intention and heart-centered design.

And be aware that there are no trap doors to disappear through into an alternate Universe where “all of this will go away.” You did not come in for that.

You may have moments where you feel that all of the truth coming out now about this person or that situation is just too much, and we would say, Release it!

Have your moment of shock if you must, but do not allow those disclosures to pull your vibration down to the level of sorrow, shock, or rage.

Face your own heart-mind now, friends!

Face your own inner shadows and unhealed aspects, and attend to their healing!

This is powerful, for one of the most profound aspects of your Earth missions is to heal your inner self, and to lift your entire frequency to levels that would have been unheard of for you in other lives.

You have not come in at this time to remark, to react, to bounce off of what is happening in the world, though of course you will have moments where you give way to that.

Yet that is not your mission at this time.

Your mission is to continue anchoring higher Light into the planet in the particular ways that are most Joyful, natural, deeply felt, and crucial to you at any one time.

As you do so, you enact a number of situations that would have difficulty unfolding without your assistance.

You give off such a powerful Light that others sense it and feel increasingly free to be their own higher self, and to celebrate that.

You give off a Peaceful vibration that reassures all around you—plant and animal life, mineral and crystal life, humans and their co-Creations—that a New Earth is being born, and that a struggle against the au regime is not necessary.

And you offer a platform for celebration, for quiet and calm, for the very foundations of higher Love itself to reinstate itself as the norm on the Earth plane, where it has not reigned supreme, one might say, for a very long time.

You do no less than all of that as you release the tangled web of deceit and machinations unfolding around you—you nullify them and their effects, and you rise above them, in those moments.

This is why you will hear people encourage you to get out into Nature more, to eat only healthful foods and mainly only drink pure water, to spend time with animals and children if you can, to meditate daily, or just sit in quiet times when thoughts are silent, as well as to celebrate and to laugh whenever you can.

It has less to do with “sticking your head in the sand” and more to do with rising above the sandstorm, so that in your strength and calm, you are able to help not only yourself but others co-Create much higher Earthly conditions and results.

And that is invaluable, friends.

Remember the power you possess to lift any situation to a higher level purely by what you call it, by what you decide that it is, and what it means.

And then paint all situations in a beautiful color—yes, even the ones where one politician or another says or does things you cannot quite believe.

For this too signals the end of the old, and the beginning of that which you have dreamt of for millennia.

Walk into that vision and claim it as your own.

It cannot be denied you now.

Namaste, friends! We are with you, always.
